of excellence, but for it to feel like you're coming to his house for an awesome dinner party. Instead of French waiters, it was all Japanese women wearing kimonos. Instead of the kitchen being out of sight and out of mind, it was open to the dining room. He celebrated the chef way before his time."

After Peter died in 1977, his son and daughter-in-law took over, running it for three decades; two of their three sons, Brian and Mark, picked up the reins in the mid-Aughts. Both had attended Cornell on ROTC scholarships, earned degrees from the Hotel school, and served in the Air Force after graduation. (Mark was in aircraft maintenance with a Special Operations unit out of Florida, while Brian's assignments included working in protocol at Andrews Air Force Base, where he frequently escorted President George W. Bush off Air Force One—to the delight of his parents, who'd glimpse him on CNN.)

At Canlis, Mark serves as CEO—primarily addressing big-picture issues—while Brian is president. "I lead our weekly strategic meeting; quarterly offsites or annual retreats, that's Mark's world," Brian explains. "He's a little more guest-faced than I am. I'm more in the office with the numbers." They've put together an advisory board for the restaurant, an industry brain trust that includes two of their close friends from Cornell: Shake Shack CEO Randy Garutti '97 and Will Guidara '01, co-owner of Manhattan's celebrated Eleven Madison Park. (Canlis's unofficial sister establishment, Eleven Madison Park was named number one by the World's 50 Best Restaurants organization last year.) "Canlis is one of the greatest restaurants on the planet, period," Guidara says. "Every region needs a restaurant that defines it, and Canlis is definitely that for the Pacific Northwest. It should be on the bucket list for anyone who has a passion for restaurants, because it's one of the most special places out there. I often tell the people who work for me that it's our responsibility to create magical worlds in a world that needs more magic—and Canlis is one of the most magical worlds I've ever found." ■
